Historical Sketch
The Baptist Student Union Study (also referred to as the Southern Baptist Convention Student Work Study) sought to assess the condition of Baptist student work on college and university campuses as directed by state and national Southern Baptist organizations. Administered through a committee chaired by J. Lamar Jackson and consisting of thirty-nine participants – including Executive Committee members, laymen, pastors, state directors, campus directors, students, and state executive secretaries – the committee oversaw the production of twelve study papers and five surveys. As part of the research, the Committee also conducted interviews with those involved in student work in the state conventions.

Baptist Student Unions (today more commonly called Baptist Collegiate Ministries) originated in the early twentieth century as independent student groups. As Baptist leaders began to appreciate the missions opportunity among college students, they created student departments at both the state and national level. Frank Hartwell Leavell served as the first director of the program at the Baptist Sunday School Board, beginning in 1921. The state conventions of Texas and North Carolina initiated student departments in 1919 and 1922 respectively. Baptist student work continued to develop, and the Baptist Student Union program flourished as more students began to attend college in the 1960s and 1970s. Today the Baptist Collegiate Ministries program continues to follow the founding objectives of the Baptist Student Union program by fostering Christian growth, outreach, and fellowship.
